

PHARMACEUTICAL PHIAL

This small medicine bottle is a reproduction of an artifact recovered at Jamestown and displayed at the Visitor Center Museum. It was designed to store one dose of medicine. It is dated 1600-1650 and came from England. Glassblowing in England was still in its infancy in the early 1600's and this is an excellent example of a simple utilitarian design manufactured during this period.

PHARMACEUTICAL PHIAL

This small medicine bottle is a reproduction of an artifact recovered at Jamestown and displayed at the Visitor Center Museum. It was designed to store one dose of medicine. It is dated 1600-1650 and came from England. Glassblowing in England was still in its infancy in the early 1600's and this is an excellent example of a simple utilitarian design manufactured during this period.

PHARMACEUTICAL PHIAL

This small medicine bottle is a reproduction of an artifact recovered at Jamestown and displayed at the Visitor Center Museum. It was designed to store one dose of medicine. It is dated 1600-1650 and came from England. Glassblowing in England was still in its infancy in the early 1600's and this is an excellent example of a simple utilitarian design manufactured during this period.

PHARMACEUTICAL PHIAL

This small medicine bottle is a reproduction of an artifact recovered at Jamestown and displayed at the Visitor Center Museum. It was designed to store one dose of medicine. It is dated 1600-1650 and came from England. Glassblowing in England was still in its infancy in the early 1600's and this is an excellent example of a simple utilitarian design manufactured during this period.

PHARMACEUTICAL PHIAL

This small medicine bottle is a reproduction of an artifact recovered at Jamestown and displayed at the Visitor Center Museum. It was designed to store one dose of medicine. It is dated 1600-1650 and came from England. Glassblowing in England was still in its infancy in the early 1600's and this is an excellent example of a simple utilitarian design manufactured during this period.

PHARMACEUTICAL PHIAL

This small medicine bottle is a reproduction of an artifact recovered at Jamestown and displayed at the Visitor Center Museum. It was designed to store one dose of medicine. It is dated 1600-1650 and came from England. Glassblowing in England was still in its infancy in the early 1600's and this is an excellent example of a simple utilitarian design manufactured during this period.

PHARMACEUTICAL PHIAL

This small medicine bottle is a reproduction of an artifact recovered at Jamestown and displayed at the Visitor Center Museum. It was designed to store one dose of medicine. It is dated 1600-1650 and came from England. Glassblowing in England was still in its infancy in the early 1600's and this is an excellent example of a simple utilitarian design manufactured during this period.

PHARMACEUTICAL PHIAL

This small medicine bottle is a reproduction of an artifact recovered at Jamestown and displayed at the Visitor Center Museum. It was designed to store one dose of medicine. It is dated 1600-1650 and came from England. Glassblowing in England was still in its infancy in the early 1600's and this is an excellent example of a simple utilitarian design manufactured during this period.

PHARMACEUTICAL PHIAL

This small medicine bottle is a reproduction of an artifact recovered at Jamestown and displayed at the Visitor Center Museum. It was designed to store one dose of medicine. It is dated 1600-1650 and came from England. Glassblowing in England was still in its infancy in the early 1600's and this is an excellent example of a simple utilitarian design manufactured during this period.